

Score a touchdown with great appetizers

I'll admit it, I haven't been much of a Denver Broncos fan this year with the absence of a certain eligible bachelor quarterback, but seeing as they are doing so well, I suppose I can root for them in the playoffs. They face the Ravens this Saturday, and (hopefully) our beloved Broncos will still be around for the big game Sunday, Feb. 3.

Chances are you'll be getting together with a bunch of buddies to watch some football action in the next few weeks, and what's a football party without great food?!

Some people watch football because they actually like football. Other people (like me), watch football because it's a fun party with good commercials and good food.

Here are a couple of my family's favorite game day appetizers.

If you happen to be hosting the party, the pepperoni bread is a super easy option to throw together, pop in the oven and have hot and ready for halftime. It comes from the Gooseberry Patch "5 Ingredients or Less!" cookbook, and you can customize it however you want! You can always double the cheese (like I do!), or you can add other pizza toppings before you roll it up.
