Holyoke City Council members faced questions regarding their decision to exclude the construction of soccer fields from the Great Outdoors Colorado grant application at their Tuesday, Aug. 20 meeting.

Sharon Jones, who had attended prior council meetings to voice her support of the fields when the idea of adding soccer fields to the application was first discussed, attended the meeting to vocalize her disappointment. Jones also raised questions about the community support issue and what could be done in the future to secure the fields.

“I am passionate for the sport, and I am passionate for getting youth involved. I guess I am here tonight to ask what it will take to have the city consider soccer fields,” Jones said.

Council members explained to Jones that the lack of community support was the reason the fields were not included in the grant. Few people who took the survey about what the city should pursue in the grant were for the addition of the fields.

Jones argued that the support for the fields and the sport in general is strong in Holyoke, but from what she has gathered, a number of supporters were unaware of the survey that was advertised in the Enterprise and on city bills that were sent to residents.

Results indicated that the fields only drew 20 percent support.

Jones also took issue with the surveys not being made available in Spanish, as Holyoke has a large Spanish-speaking population.

Jones' request for the number of participants in the survey was denied at the meeting by Mayor Orville Tonsing. Citing Colorado's Open Records Act, the Enterprise's request for the survey numbers Wednesday morning resulted in immediate release of that information at the city office.

According to the survey, only four people were in favor of the soccer fields, of the total of 20 who completed the survey.

As advised by Heidi Hillman, the grant writer hired for the project, council members initially withheld the participation level because the low survey response could hurt the city's chances of obtaining the grant.

Jones was advised that forming a small focus group or even getting a petition together would be acceptable routes in which to show the support for the cause in the future.

If the city does not receive the GOCO grant, the next grant cycle is set for March. Council member Kevin Scott was quick to point out that the county would be pursuing a GOCO grant in the next cycle, so for the city to try to attain the funds for soccer fields at that time would weaken both parties' chances of being chosen for the grants.

Jones indicated she planned to gather support from the community for the fields, but no timetable was established for when or if the city would consider the fields as a future project.

The city's GOCO grant has been completed and council members voted to support the application which was scheduled to be submitted Tuesday, Aug. 27.
