

All the clues fall in place at HHS murder mystery

Written by Darci Tomky

---

Maybe it was Rufus in the parlor with an ax? Or was it Paula in the library with a gun? Possibly even Bensonhurst in the dining room with a wrench?

All the players were in place as a classic detective game of Clue played out on stage at the HHS drama department's production of "Murder's in the Heir" on the HHS stage Friday and Saturday, March 28-29.

Audience members had to collect all the clues to help solve the mystery of billionaire Simon Starkweather's death. They even became players in the game themselves when, at intermission, they voted on their choice for the murderer, which actually determined the outcome of the suspicious tale.

The play, co-directed by Eric Conklin and Penny Dockins, had everyone on the edge of their seats, as each character had a different weapon and different motive for doing in the old man.

The sickly Starkweather (Cody Lamm) had gathered his family, lawyers and house staff together in his mansion for the announcement of a new will.

His heirs and his staff, who all thought they'd inherit thousands, if not millions, of dollars, were not pleased to find out the new will, effective the next morning, would give the money to a soon-to-be clone of Starkweather.

"A million dollars—a lot of people would kill for that much money!!"

For the full article, consider an e-Subscription. Call 970-854-2811.

All the clues fall in place at HHS murder mystery

Written by Darci Tomky

---

He's the one who's been on Whitney Powell when he hears he is no

By a strange coincidence, Grant is on the list, and he's part of the

and the other people who are in the room, and they are all looking at the